Question 3

The artwork below is on temporary display in Trafalgar Square, London, until April 2007.

Trafalgar Square is a large public space in the centre of London that was originally created as a site for large-scale public sculptures commemorating famous British military heroes.

Alison Lapper Pregnant has been put on the square's last empty pedestal as part of a recent campaign to revitalise the city with artworks that are considered to be more appropriate to the city's current values. It represents the contemporary British artist, Alison Lapper, who was born in 1965 without arms and with shortened legs as the result of a medical condition.

The sculpture has been celebrated by many viewers, but also criticised by others as being inappropriate for the site.

Marc Quinn, Alison Lapper Pregnant, white Carrara marble, 2000

3.55 metres high

Imagine that you are a city official deciding whether to install this artwork.

Do you think it should be displayed in this location?

Give reasons for your point of view. In your response refer to the ideas raised in the explanation above and at least two of the commentaries opposite, and to the illustrations above.
